Mr. R. A. McINNES, J.P., seconded Mr. Garrod's nomination. He had had the honour of knowing Mr. Garrod for some years, and the longer acquaintance the more he appreciated Mr. Garrod's character and his high standard of conduct. Mr. Garrod was a man of superior intelligence and ability, and was thoroughly satisfied with Mr. Garrod's candidature for the office of the electorate. He had discharged his duties only too efficiently, but to the utmost of his power, and he was sure that the electorate would be able to judge for themselves. Mr. Garrod was a man of high integrity in the country that would reflect him in a degree of diffidence in alluding to the gross fraud which had been used on Mr. Garrod by his political opponents. Mr. Garrod was a man of high integrity, and he was sure that the electorate would be able to judge for themselves. Mr. Garrod was a man of high integrity, and he was sure that the electorate would be able to judge for themselves.

He was a man of great abilities, in the private and public life, and for many years called to the bar. He was a member of the legislature, and was elected to the office of speaker of the house. He was also a member of the committee on the subject of the proposed amendment to the constitution, and was one of the most active and able advocates of the measure. He was also a member of the committee on the subject of the proposed amendment to the constitution, and was one of the most active and able advocates of the measure. He was also a member of the committee on the subject of the proposed amendment to the constitution, and was one of the most active and able advocates of the measure.

Mr. GARETT was always at his constant great presence, and his influence. There were no great prizes, but he had the happy lot of discomfiting every one who was less. The great scramble now going on, on the public lands made the land question one of peculiar interest, but he believed it was the hands of a great majority of the people to deal with it. He had great pleasure in proposing Mr. Garrett, not only as a candidate for re-election, but as the fittest and most proper person here to be at the electorate. (Cheers.)

No other candidate being proposed, the Returning-officers Mr. Garrett duly elected.

Mr. GARETT, who was cheered on coming forward, the speaker, said it was with the deepest satisfaction that he had the honor to call on him, and to give him the distinction that he had so richly deserved.

that had been said against him, and of observing his conduct, and this expression of approval, after what had taken place, was a matter of the deepest possible satisfaction. He could regret only that he had not been able to do better in future in the order of his remarks, and he was rejoiced in him. With regard to the general matter to which he referred, namely, his recent visit to the Government of Sir John Robert Gordon, at February 22, he described the task which he had undertaken, and the difficulties which he had met with in a time of unexampled difficulty in regard to the education of the public lands. There was a scramble—a sort of almost—between extending classes in the country, and the public lands by hook or by crook, and he was very much pleased to see that the Government means whatever it will this time, and that it is determined in the Lands Office. The Government ingly inappreciable, in so far as its power was concerned the difficulty and of settling the cases as they arose. The consequence was that, when he went into office, over thousands of cases were pending for settlement. Not only was that the case, a month afterwards, the scrambling increased tenfold, and he, now to office, had to grapple with the situation. Then, while the work of the office was greater than it had ever been before, he believed, than any human being could manage alone. "If I—he not only had the pressing work of his office to settle, but, after day, he had to face able, unscrupulous, and highly experienced men, who were content with securing the best of the office, but not with securing the public good, and made charges against him which disputably proved to be false. These charges rendered her, distracted his mind, occupied, as it already was, with the two great evils of the country, and, ever since the accumulation of troubles, he had not had a time, he only did what was human to him, he only did what was human to him, he only did what was human to him. The poet told us, "To be human, to forgive divine;" but those in Opposition to the Government, who were not human, did not distribute of forgiveness towards him, and night after night, week after week, month after month, they persecuted him with virulence and pertinacity never equalled in any country towards any public man. Therefore, in regard to the matter, public life in this country is not a life of honor, but a life of degradation, and it is to the credit of his friends, and injurious as it might be to the reputation of public life in this country, it was committed under stances such as no public man in this country had ever been placed in. However, when he thought it was proper to do so, he rose to his feet, and turned to himself, to the House, and to the country, that it was not to long before he worthily retrieved his position (cheers) and he would just read to them the few concluding words of his speech in which he announced his resignation. He then read out about a dozen lines of his speech, and then he proposed at that time. (Applause.) In the evening at took place on the motion made by Mr. Piddington concerning the Government, because, as he supposed, he (Mr. Piddington) was still a member of it. He concluded his remarks with these words: "I have no doubt that the people of this country would, he believed, be with him now that he should have their sympathy outside of it."

way for the vessel, and at least £50,000 a year increase in money invested, and the cost of maintaining the vessel was proposed, that this ironclad should be built and placed at the order of the Government, that it should be maintained at the cost of the country; and that proposals for the purchase of a new vessel while the old vessel was being repaired, while we had palpable evidence by the news from England and other parts of the world, that these ironclads were unmanageable and unreliable, and could be destroyed by a torpedo boat. The cost of the vessel was £24 or £25, and from this to £50, and when we had the highest scientific opinions that the ironclads were so destructive to the ironclads that the wisdom of naval warfare must be changed in order to re-would have taken two years to bring the ironed lead before that time had elapsed the present war, would lead to the proposal to have an ironed, would be so and we should have had an expensive toy and a monument to our failure. Instead of this, we should have had an ironed, we should reply to the English Government to send us one, and that we would maintain it while was here. That was a sensible and a liberal proposal because the Imperial Government, when they were their troops sent to India, they were not to be confined to protect this country in regard to outward naval defence; and this had been done up to the time. It was liberality of an extreme kind and I think offer to maintain this ironed, if it is not.

appreciated by the taxpayers* of the large and numerous colonies of the country. He did a country a great deal of good by saving this large amount of money, and thinking that it was lost, and in order to see how he could put the money usefully, he proposed to increase the number of the colonies in proportion to the different classes, amounting in all to about 115,000. This proposal was opposed by the clergy, who thought that the money ought to be sent to the House; they put him in talk against him, and said they intended to do something like he had done, pointing to a schedule proposed by themselves. But his proposal was carried, and the money was put on a similar amount to be used for other roads and bridges in the country. So that the country would have the benefit of having £250,000.

went this year than otherwise would have been the case, and this was in consequence of the action of the Government. The Government, however, in which I should fairly claim to have redeemed his name, made himself useful to the country. I am aware of many other respects he had endeavoured, with the most successful part in the House, and in the most efficacious manner, to do good to the people, to secure the best duties, to reduce the tax on the sugar of the most possible good out of what was proposed for people at large. Now he came to the matter which brought him to the present crisis. That was a matter which was not his own, but which was the business of the Government, and he was called upon to give his opinion with regard to the administration of the Slave Act. They were all aware that in 1850 he brought a bill to amend the law of 1861. The report of it was to remedy the defects that had been working of the law of 1891. Very little new material was introduced into the amended bill. - That bill was

Table with 2 columns: Commodity and Price. Includes items like Flour, Sugar, Coffee, and various oils.

The Stock and Share market was extremely dull to-day. The depression in Bank stock was again noticeable, and no sales were effected. Mercantile were offered at 7, New South Wales at 62, and others at yesterday's quotations.

The business of the Mutual Life Association has been removed to their new offices, corner of George and Wynyard streets. Business in the Import markets shows no indications of improvement. A few trade orders continue to come to hand from Queensland, and with demands of a similar character for local requirements are taking a limited quantity of goods from importers' hands.

We take the following from the London Bulletin, circular, of Messrs. Bixley, Abell, and Co., of June 30: Gold.—The market is said to be in a state of depression, and the price of gold is said to be in a state of depression.

REVIEW.

Charlotte Brontë's 'Auntie' by T. Weyman.

In all modern literary history there are few figures so picturesque as Charlotte Brontë, and we are glad to see again the name of her. The book is a review of her life and works, and is a very interesting and valuable contribution to the knowledge of this great writer.
